

Elderly Georgia fugitive remains out on bond in Connecticut, continues to fight extradition

BY LAURA ROBERTS

The state has served a fugitive from Georgia who has lived in Connecticut for 48 years with an extradition warrant. Robert Stackowitz, 71, escaped from a prison work camp in Carrolton, Georgia back in 1968. That was two years into a 17-year sentence for robbery by force.

His defense attorney Norm Pattis is doing all he can to extend the extradition process, so Stackowitz can live out the rest of his days in Connecticut.

“The appeal process could take a year to a year and a half, so our objective is to keep this fight going as long as we can to keep Mr. Stackowitz in his home.”

During a hearing in Danbury Superior Court on Tuesday, Pattis filed an independent civil proceeding to challenge the extradition warrant and asked Stackowitz be released on bond. He was able to return back home to Sherman, Connecticut after posting just $100 bond at the civil proceeding.

“ [Norm] Pattis said, “At the end of the day we were able to walk him out the courthouse door, which is every criminal defense lawyer’s objective.”

Pattis said, “At the end of the day we were able to walk him out the courthouse door, which is every criminal defense lawyer’s objective.”

Pattis is arguing Stackowitz has numerous health problems and sending him back to Georgia would be a death sentence. He also intends to take the case to federal court arguing extradition under these circumstances falls under cruel and unusual punishment.

“Today was terrifying. I thought the judge was going to deny bond and Mr. Stackowitz was going to be taken into prison where he would have most certainly died,” said Pattis, after Tuesday’s hearing.

He said, “He did a couple years on a chain gang. He’s been rehabilitated. His 49 year track record shows that. He hasn’t committed any other crimes, so what other than a sense of bloodlust or vengeance inspires Georgia to seek his return?”

Stackowitz was arrested on May 9 in Sherman, CT where he had been living peacefully for years while working as a boat repairman. His application for social security played a role in his capture, according to authorities.

He is due back in court on September 26, when a judge could decide to reconsider his bond. ■
